

Uniform with this volume

EURIPIDES

Alcletis (24th Thousand)
BACCHE (29th Thousand)
ELECTRA (58th Thousand)
Hippolytus (40th Thousand)
Iphigenia in Tauris (32nd Thousand)
Medea (33rd Thousand)
Rhesus (9th Thousand)
The Trojan Women (39th Thousand)

ARISTOPHANES

THE FROGS (24th Thousand)

SOPHOCLES

OFDIPUS, KING OF THEBES (30th Thousand)
THE ANTIGONE (4th Thousand)

AESCHYLUS

AGAMFMNON (14th Thousand)

THE CHOEPHOROE (5th Thousand)

THE EUMINIDES (4th Thousand)

THE SUPPLIANT WOMEN (SUPPLICES)
(4th Thousand)

PROMETHEUS BOUND (4th Thousand)

THE SEVEN AGAINST THEBES (4th Thousand)

THI PERSIANS (3rd Thousand)

THE RAPL OF THE LOCKS

The Perikeiromenê of Menander

THE ORESTEIA (Collected Edition)

THE

CHOËPHOROE

(LIBATION-BEARERS)

OF

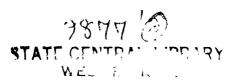

AESCHYLUS

TRANSLATED INTO ENGLISH RHYMING VERSE
BY

GILBERT MURRAY, O.M.,
FORMERLY REGIUS PROFESSOR OF GREEK IN THE UNIVERSITY OF OXFORD

LONDON: GEORGE ALLEN & UNWIN LTD. RUSKIN HOUSE, 40 MUSEUM STREET, W.C.1

First published in 1923 Second Impression 1947 (All rights reserved)

CALCUTTA

4 1 62

Printed in Great Britain by UNWIN BROTHERS LIMITED, THE GRESHAM PRESS, LONDON AND WOKING

IMMATURA MORTE PEREMPTAE

A. E. M.

FILIOLAE COMMILITONI EXEMPLO

HOC CARMEN DEDICO

The Choëphoroe, or Libation-Bearers, is the second play in the only trilogy preserved to us from the Athenian stage: Agamemnon, Choëphoroe, Eumenides. The first gives the murder of Agamemnon by his wife Clytemnestra and her lover Aigisthos; the second the vengeance of Orestes, helped by his sister Electra; the third deals with the ultimate solution of the problem of Sin and Punishment, the purification of Orestes from the murder of his mother and the conversion of the spirits of Punishment from Furies to Beneficent Beings, from "Erinyes" to "Eumenides."

The vengeance of Orestes was made the subject of plays by all three tragedians. All the plays are in their ways masterpieces, and each highly characteristic of its writer. Euripides realizes and psychologizes the horror of the story; Sophocles, apparently from a deliberate adoption of the "Homeric" tone, suppresses the religious problem and concentrates on the elements of direct passion. Aeschylus, as I have said elsewhere, "though steeped in the glory of the world of legend, would not lightly accept its judgment upon religious and moral questions, and above all would not, in that region, play at make-believe. He would not elude the horror of this story by simply not mentioning it, like Homer, or by pretending that an evil act was a good one, like Sophocles. He faces the horror; realizes it; and tries to surmount it on the sweep of a great wave of religious emotion. The mother-murder, even if done by a god's command, is a sin; a sin to be expiated by unfathomable suffering. Yet, since the god cannot have commanded evil, it is a duty also. It is a sin that must be committed." The crucial difference is that the Choëphoroe is not selfcontained, while the other plays are. They are concerned with a particular story; it is part of a trilogy dealing with the great problem which lies at the centre of Greek religion—Hubris, Dike, Soteria or Crime, Punishment and Deliverance. (I may refer the reader to my introductions to the Agamemnon and to Euripides' Electra.)

Thus, though to the Greek student this is perhaps, of all extant tragedies, the most obscure in detail of language, to the English reader it is not hard to understand. The atmosphere indeed is very ancient: it demands imaginative effort: but the sympathy goes as we would wish it to go and the story tells itself. Only two points call for special comment.

The first is the name of the play. The other two plays are called Electra, after the chief character: this is called Choephoroe, or Libation-Bearers, after the Chorus. For in truth the subjects are not, artistically speaking, quite the same. The main interest of the other plays is to describe how the woman Electra felt and acted with regard to the murder of her mother and step-father; in this play it is to narrate how Agamemnon, the long dead, was awakened to help his children to avenge him. The ghosts in Homer could not speak till they had drunk the blood of sacrifice. Somewhat in the same way the dead Agamemnon here cannot gather his dim senses till the drink-offerings have sunk into his The wine and milk and honey reach his parched lips. He stirs in his sleep, and in that one moment of hesitating consciousness there are crowded upon him all those appeals that have most power to rouse and sting. The first words spoken in prayer at his neglected tomb; the call for vengeance sent, as it were, unknowingly by the murderess; the repeated story of his old wrongs and the outrage done upon his body; above all, the voices of his desolate children crying to him for that which he himself craves. There is no visible apparition from the tomb, as there is, for instance, in the Persae. But as the great litany grows in intensity of longing, the dead seem to draw nearer to the living, and conviction comes to the mourners, one after another, that he who was once King of Kings is in power among them. Where in all literature, except Aeschylus, could one find this union of primitive ghostliness with high intellectual passion? One hand seems to reach out to the African or Polynesian, while the other clasps that of Milton or Goethe.

I adopt this traditional Latin transliteration in preference to "Choephori." Cf. Terence's Adelphoe. For readers without Greek I may mention that the word has four syllables, first the syllable "Co," then "E for E."

Another point which the hasty reader might overlook is the psychological treatment of Orestes. At the end of the play, of course, he goes mad. That is in the legend. But from quite the early scenes—much of the prologue happens to be lost—the shadow of the coming darkness begins to show itself. And the occasion for it is always the same, the conflict between two horrors which are also duties: the murder of his mother on one side, and on the other disobedience to the command of God.

Here, as in most cases, the development of Greek tragedy moves almost straight from Aeschylus to Euripides, with Sophocles standing aside. The character of Orestes, in particular, contains here in germ just the ideas that are so subtly developed in Euripides. The first study is grander, tenderer, and more heroic; the second, of course, more detailed and varied and more finely poignant. There is a typical difference between the two poets in the way in which Orestes' last scruples are overcome. In Euripides a whole scene is given up to it. Orestes is shaken by the first sight of his mother in the distance, and actually rebels against the god or devil who has commanded him to kill her, till he is overborne by the scorn and passion of Electra's more bitter nature. In Aeschylus Orestes' scruple breaks out in the midst of the Invocation and is swept away, not specially by Electra, but by the whole great swelling rhythm of that litany of revenge.

Of the other characters, Electra in Euripides bears the main weight of the tragedy on her own shoulders. In Aeschylus she is much less minutely and without doubt less cruelly studied: almost all her words are beautiful, and she keeps a kind of tenderness even in her prayers of hate. She hates her oppressors and her father's enemies; but the hate is based on love, and it has not eaten into her nor left her poisoned. Clytemnestra, though she appears only for two short scenes, preserves still the almost superhuman grandeur which was hers in the Agamemnon. Her simplest word has power to arrest the attention; and while she is present other people seem small and their emotions ordinary. Her own emotions lie deep and complex, fold behind fold. It is shallow to dismiss her as a hypocrite, feigning grief at the death of the son whom she fears. The hypocrisy is there, but so is the sorrow; so are all kinds of unspoken memories and hopes and depths of experience. Always the thing she says, fine as it is, leaves the impression that there is something greater that she does not care to say. Even when she calls for the axe of battle to face her son, she has room for a thought beyond the immediate fight for dear life: "To that mescemeth we are come, we two!" That touch is like Euripides, but on the whole this heroine was a figure not in Euripides' style and perhaps not within his range. He made a Clytemnestra deliberately and utterly different.

The date of Sophocles' play is unknown. But the Choëphoroe was produced in 458 B.C., and Euripides' Electra in 413. The forty-five years that separate them were years of very rapid artistic development. The Choëphoroe has both an archaic beauty and a stark grimness of speech which divide it from its two companions. There are fewer details, and attention is never long distracted from the central horror. At point after point of the action it is easy to show how the two later poets refined and developed the plain lines of Aeschylus, and exerted themselves to make the story more human and more probable. The comparison tempts one to reflect how little such technical improvements really matter, and how dangerously near to nothingness, in the last resort, are the ingenuities of realism. This play produces its illusion quite sufficiently by its mere grandeur and intensity. Yet, judged on its own archaic level, it shows remarkable skill in construction, just as, amid its story of relentless revenge, it conveys a great sense of compassion. The prologue itself is very skilful. With the last lines of the Agamemnon still ringing in our minds we see, as the play opens, a young man standing with shorn hair beside a grave mound; and half the story is told in a flash. Nor, apart from the marvellous invocation scene itself, would it be easy to find in Greek drama another play with such varied moments as the prayer of Electra, the entry of the poor, loving, half-ridiculous Nurse, the sudden onrush of the single terrified slave calling for help to the Women's House; above all, the amazing scene at the end with the blood-stained robe, the gathering of the unseen Furies, the last struggle of Orestes' reason, and the flight of the would-be Saviour as one Accursed, never to rest again. The final words of the Chorus ask the question which is to be answered, or at least attempted, in the Eumenides.

G. M.

CHARACTERS IN THE PLAY

ORESTES, son of Agamemnon and Clytemnestra.

ELECTRA, daughter of Agamemnon and Clytemnestra.

CLYTEMNESTRA, formerly wife to Agamemnon, now wedded to Aigisthos.

AIGISTHOS, son of Thyestes, blood-foe to Agamemnon, and now Tyrant of Argos.

PYLADES, son of Strophios, King of Phôkis, friend to Orestes.

The OLD NURSE of Orestes.

A SLAVE of Aigisthos.

CHORUS of Bondmaids in the House of Clytemnestra and Aigisthos.

CHARACTERS MENTIONED IN THE PLAY

AGAMEMNON, son of Atreus, King of Argos, Overlord of all Hellas and Chief of the Greek Armies; murdered by Clytemnestra and Aigisthos.

MENELAUS, brother of Agamemnon, husband of Helen.

ZEUS, Father of Gods and Men: Latin Jupiter.

APOLLO or LOXIAS, son of Zeus, the prophetic God of Delphi.

HERMÉS, Herald of the Gods, Guide of the Souls of the Dead, also patron of craft and darkness: Latin Mercurius.

The Greeks are referred to as Hellenes, Achaians and Argives; Troy is also called Îlion.

"The play was first produced in the archorship of Philocles (458 B.C.). The First Prize was won by Aeschylus with the Agamemnon, Choephoroe, Eumenides and the Satyr-play Proteus."

THE CHOËPHOROE

The scene represents the Grave of Agamemnon, a mound of earth in a desolute expanse. The time is afternoon. Orestes and Pylades in the garb of travellers, with swords at their sides, are discovered. Orestes' hair is cut short, that of Pylades streams down his back. Both look grim and travel-stained. Orestes holds a long tress of hair in his hand.

ORESTES.

O Warder Hermes of the world beneath,
Son of the Father who is Lord of Death;
Saviour, be thou my saviour; Help in War,
Help me! I am returned from lands afar
To claim mine own. And on this headland steep
Of death, I call my Father o'er the deep
To hearken, to give ear.—Behold, I bring
Out of my poverty one little thing,
To adorn thy grave, though who can touch the dead
Or wake from sleep that unuplifted head?
Yet long ago in Phokis, where I lay
With Strophius in the hills, being cast away
In childhood, plundered by mine enemies,
And friendless, save for this man, Pylades,

I sware an oath which should for ever set In memory those they taught me to forget: If once I came to manhood, so I sware, In tresses twain I would divide mine hair, One tress for Inachos river, by whose grace I live, and one for mourning at this place. Which oath I here fulfil.

> [He lays the tress of hair upon the upper part of the grave mound.

O Herald, lay Before his sight the gift I bring this day, Who stood not by to mourn him as he fell, Nor reached mine arms to bid the dead farewell.

As he turns, he sees the Libation-Bearers approaching.

Ha!

What sight is this? What stricken multitude Of women here in raiment sable-hued Far-gleameth? How shall I interpret it? Hath some new death upon my lineage lit? Or is it to my father's grave they go With offerings, to appease the wrath below? It must be. Surely 'tis Electra there, My sister, moves alone, none like to her In sorrow. O great Zeus, grant me this day My vengeance, and be near me in the frav! Come, Pylades, stand further, till we know More sure, what means this embassy of woe.

[ORESTES and PYLADES withdraw, as ELECTRA with the CHORUS of women bearing offerings for the Grave enters from the other side.

22-51 THE CHOËPHOROE

Chorus.

Driven, yea, driven

I come: I bear Peace-offering to the dead,

Mine hands as blades that tear, my tresses riven,

And cheek ploughed red.

But all my years, before this day as after,

Have been fed full with weeping as with bread

And this dumb cry of linen, as in pain,

Deep rent about my bosom, speaketh plain

Of a life long since wounded, where no laughter

Sounds nor shall sound again.

Dread, very dread, [Antistrophe 1]
And hair upstarting and the wrath that streams
From the heart of sleep, have first interpreted
What manner of dreams

This house hath dreamed; a voice of terror, blasting
The midnight, up from the inmost place it grew,
Shaking the women's chambers; and the Seer,
Being sworn of God, made answer, there is here
Anger' of dead men wronged, and hate outlasting
Death, against them that slew.

Craving to fly that curse [Strophe 2]
With graceless gift hither she urgeth me
—O Earth, Mother and Nurse!—
She whom God hateth. But my spirit fears
To speak the word it bears.
When blood is spilt, how shall a gift set free?
O hearthstone wet with tears!
O pillars of a house broken in twain!
Without sun, without love,
Murk in the heart thereof and mist above,

For a lord slain!

THE CHOEPHOROE 52-76

[Antistrophe 2

The reverence of old years

Is gone, which not by battle nor by strife,
Stealing through charmèd ears,

Lifted the people's hearts to love their King;
Gone, yet the land still fears.

For Fortune is a god and rules men's life.
Who knows the great Wheel's swing,

How one is smitten swift in the eyes of light;
For one affliction cries

Slow from the border of sunset; and one lies

In deedless night?

[Strophe 3

Has Earth once drunk withal

The blood of her child, Man, the avenging stain
Hardens, nor flows again.

A blind pain draweth the slayer, draweth him,
On, on, till he is filled even to the brim
With sickness of the soul to atone for all.

[Antistrophe 3

The shrine of maidenhood

Once broken ne'er may be unbroke again.

And where man's life hath flowed,

All the world's rivers in their multitude

Rolling shall strive in vain

To clean from a brother's hand that ancient blood.

For me, God in far days

Laid hand upon my city, and herded me

From my old home to the House of Slavery,

Where all is violence, and I needs must praise,

Just or unjust,

77-104 THE CHOEPHOROE

The pleasure of them that rule, and speechless hold. The ache of a heart that rageth in the dust.

Only behind the fold Of this still veil for a little I hide my face And weep for the blind doings of this race, And secret tears are in my heart, ice-cold.

ELECTRA.

Ye thrallèd women, tirers of the bower, Since ye are with me in this suppliant hour, Your escort giving, give your counsel too. What speech have I for utterance, when I sue With offerings to the dead? What word of love, What prayer to reach my father from above? "To dear Lord," shall I say, "due gifts I bear From loving mistress"... when they come from her? I dare not. And I cannot find the word To speak, when offerings like these are poured. . . . Or shall I pray him, as men's custom is, To send to them who pay these offices Requital due . . . for murder and for pride? Or, as in silence and in shame he died, In shame and silence shall I pour this urn Of offering to the dust, and pouring turn, As men cast out some foulness they abhor, And fling the cup, and fly, and look no more? Share with me, Friends, this burden of strange thought.

One hate doth make us one. Oh, hide not aught For fear of what may fall us! Destiny Waiteth alike for them that men call free, And them by others mastered. At thine ease Speak, if thou knowest of wiser words than these.

THE CHOEPHOROE 105-116

LEADER.

As at God's altar, since so fain thou art, Before this Tomb I will unveil my heart.

ELECTRA.

Speak, by his grave and in the fear thereof.

LEADER.

Pray as thou pourest: To all hearts of love . . .

ELECTRA.

And who is such of all around us, who?

LEADER.

Thyself, and whoso hates Aigisthos true.

ELECTRA.

For thee and me alone am I to pray?

LEADER.

Ask thine own understanding. It will say.

ELECTRA.

Who else? What heart that with our sorrow grieves?

LEADER.

Forget not that-far off-Orestes lives.

ELECTRA.

Oh, bravely spoke! Thou counsellest not in vain.

LEADER.

Next; on the sinners pray, their sin made plain. . . .

117-133 THE CHOËPHOROE

ELECTRA

Pray what? I know not. Oh, make clear my road!

LEADER.

Pray that there come to them or man or god. . . .

ELECTRA.

A judge? Or an avenger? Speak thy prayer.

LEADER.

Plain be thy word: one who shall slay the slayer.

ELECTRA.

But dare I? Is it no sin thus to pray?

LEADER.

How else? With hate thine hater to repay.

[ELECTRA mounts upon the Grave Mound and makes sacrifice.

ELECTRA.

Herald most high of living and of dead,
Thou midnight Hermes, hear; and call the dread
Spirits who dwell below the Earth, my vows
To hearken and to watch my father's house;
And Earth our Mother, who doth all things breed
And nurse, and takes again to her their seed.
And I too with thee, as I pour these streams
To wash dead hands, will call him in his dreams:
O Father, pity me; pity thine own
Orestes, and restore us to thy throne;
We are lost, we are sold like slaves: and in our stead
Lo, she hath brought thy murderer to her bed,

THE CHOEPHOROE 134-156

Aigisthos. I am like one chained alway; Orestes wandering without house or stay; But they are full of pride, and make turmoil And banquet of the treasures of thy toil. Guide thou Orestes homeward, let there be Some chance to aid him: -Father, hark to me! And, oh, give me a heart to understand More than my mother, and a cleaner hand! These prayers for us; but for our enemies This also I speak: O Father, let there rise Against them thine Avenger, and again The slaver in just recompense be slain.— Behold, I pray great evil, and I lay These tokens down; yea, midmost as I pray Against thine enemies I lay them-so. Do thou to us send blessing from below With Zeus, and Earth, and Right which conquereth all.

These be the prayers on which mine offerings fall. Do ye set lamentation like a wreath Round them, and cry the triumph-song of death.

[She proceeds with the pouring of offerings and presently finds on the tomb the Lock of Hair. The Chorus makes lamentation before the grave.

CHORUS.

Let fall the tear that plashes as it dies,
Where the dead lies,
Fall on this barrèd door,
Where Good nor Evil entereth any more,
This holy, abhorrèd thing,
We turn from, praying.—Lo, the milk and wine

157-171 THE CHOEPHOROE

Are poured. Awake and hear, thou awful King; Hear in thy darkened soul, O Master mine!

Oh, for some man of might
To aid this land, some high and visible lord
Of battle, shining bright
Against Death; the great lance
Bearing deliverance,
The back-bent Scythian bow, the hilted sword
Close-held to smite and smite!

ELECTRA (excitedly returning from the Grave).

Behold,

The offerings of the dust are ministered: But counsel me. I bear another word.

LEADER.

Speak on. My spirit leaps for eagerness.

ELECTRA.

Cast on the tomb I found this shaven tress.

LEADER.

Who cast it there? What man or zoned maid?

ELECTRA.

Methinks that is a riddle quickly read!

LEADER.

Thy thought is swift; and may thine elder know?

ELECTRA.

What head save mine would blazon thus its woe?

THE CHOEPHOROE 172-183

LEADER.

She that should mourn him is his enemy.

ELECTRA (musing, to herself).

Strange bird, but of one feather to mine eye. . . .

LEADER.

With what? Oh, speak. Make thy comparison.

ELECTRA.

Look; think ye not 'tis wondrous like mine own?

LEADER.

Thy brother's!... Sent in secret! Can it be?

ELECTRA.

'Tis like his long locks in my memory.

LEADER.

Orestes! Would he dare to walk this land?

ELECTRA.

Belike he sent it by another's hand!

LEADER.

That calls for tears no less, if never more His footstep may be set on Argos shore.

ELECTRA

At my heart also bitterer than gall
A great wave beats. The iron hath passed thro' all

184-210 THE CHOEPHOROE

My being; and the stormy drops that rise Full unforbidden from these starved eyes. Gazing upon this hair. 'Tis past belief That any Argive tree hath shed this leaf. And sure she shore it not who wrought his death, My mother, godless, with no mother's faith Or kindness for her child.—And yet to swear Outright that this glad laugher is the hair Of my beloved Orestes. . . . Oh, I am weak With dreaming! Had it but a voice to speak Like some kind messenger, I had not been This phantom tossing in the wind between Two fancies. Either quick it would proclaim Its hate, if from some hater's head it came; Or, if it were our own, with me 'twould shed Tears for this tomb and our great father dead. . . . Surely they know, these gods to whom we pray, Through what wild seas our vessel beats her way, And, if to save us is their will, may breed A giant oak out of a little seed. . . .

[She goes back to the Tomb, searching.

Ah see, the print of feet, a second sign!
The same feet: surely they are shaped like mine.
Surely! Two separate trails of feet are there:
He and perchance some fellow traveller.
The heels: the mark of the long muscle thrown Athwart them on the sand—just like mine own
In shape and measure. What?... Oh, all is vain;
Torment of heart and blinding of the brain!

[She buries her face in her hands. Orfstes rises from his hiding-place and stands before her.

THE CHOEPHOROE 211-221

ORESTES.

Thy prayer hath borne its fruit. Hereafter tell The gods thy thanks, and may the end be well!

ELECTRA.

What meanest thou? What hath God done for me?

ORESTES.

Shown thee a face which thou hast longed to see.

ELECTRA.

What face? What know'st thou of my secret heart?

ORESTES.

Orestes'. For that name all fire thou art.

ELECTRA.

If that be so, how am I near mine end?

ORESTES.

Here am I, Sister. Seek no closer friend.

ELECTRA.

Stranger! It is a plot thou lay'st for me!

ORESTES.

Against mine own dear life that plot would be.

ELECTRA.

Thou mock'st me! Thou would'st laugh to hear me moan!

222-241 THE CHOEPHOROE

ORESTES.

Who mocks thy tribulation mocks mine own.

ELECTRA.

My heart half dares foretell that thou art he . . .

ORESTES.

Nay, when I face thee plain thou wilt not see!
Oh, seeing but that shorn tress of funeral hair
Thy soul took wings and seemed to hold me there;
Then peering in my steps . . . thou knew'st them
mine,

Thy brother's, moulded feet and head like thine. Set the lock here, where it was cut. Behold This cloak I wear, thy woven work of old, The battened ridges and the broidered braid Of lions . . .

[ELECTRA throws herself into his arms.

Ah, bethink thee! Nor be swayed With joy too soon. Our nearest is our foe.

ELECTRA.

O best beloved, O dreamed of long ago, Seed of deliverance washed with tears as rain, By thine own valour thou shalt build again Our father's House! O lightener of mine eyes, Four places in my heart, four sanctities, Are thine. My father in thy face and mien Yet living: thine the love that might have been My mother's—whom I hate, most righteously— And my poor sister's, fiercely doomed to die,

THE CHOEPHOROE 242-266

And thou my faithful brother, who alone Hast cared for me. . . O Victory, be our own This day, with Justice who doth hold us fast, And Zeus most high, who saveth at the last!

ORESTES.

O Zeus, O Zeus, look down on our estate! Hast seen thine eagle's brood left desolate. The father in the fell toils overborne Of some foul serpent, and the young forlorn And starved with famine, still too weak of wing To bear to the nest their father's harvesting? Even so am I, O Zeus, and even so This woman, both disfathered long ago, Both to one exile cast, both desolate. He was thy worshipper, thy giver great Of sacrifice. If thou tear down his nest, What hand like his shall glorify thy feast? Blot out the eagle's brood, and where again Hast thou thy messenger to speak to men? Blast this most royal oak, what shade shall cool Thine altars on the death-day of the Bull? But cherish us, and from a little seed Thou shalt make great a House now fallen indeed.

LEADER.

O Children, Saviours of your father's House, Be silent! Children, all is perilous; And whoso hears may idly speak of ye To our masters; whom may I yet live to see Dead where the pine logs ooze in fragrant fire!

267-293 THE CHOEPHOROE

ORESTES. (He speaks with increasing horror as he proceeds.)

Oh, Loxias shall not mock my great desire,
Who spoke his divine promise, charging me
To thread this peril to the extremity:
Yea, raised his awful voice and surging told
To my hot heart of horrors stormy-cold
Till I seek out those murderers, by the road
Themselves have shown—so spake he—blood for blood:

What recketh the wild bull of gold or prayers? Which failing, for the sin that now is theirs Myself shall pay with torment manifold. Of many things that rise from earth he told, To appease the angry dead: yea, and strange forms, On thee and me, of savage-fanged worms, Climbing the flesh; lichens, which eat away Even unto nothingness our natural clay. And when they leave him, a man's hair is white. For him that disobeys, he said, the night Hath Furies, shapen of his father's blood; Clear-seen, with eyeball straining through the hood Of darkness. The blind arrows of dead men Who cried their kin for mercy and were slain, And madness, and wild fear out of the night, Shall spur him, rack him, till from all men's sight Alone he goes, out to the desert dim, And that bronze horror clanging after him!

For such as he there is no mixing bowl, No dear libation that binds soul to soul: From every altar fire the unseen rage Outbars him: none shall give him harbourage, Nor lie in the same house with such an one;

29

THE CHOEPHOROE 294-317

Till, without worship, without love, alone He crawls to his death, a carcase to the core Through-rotted, and embalmed to suffer more. Collecting himself]

So spake he . . . God, and is one to believe Such oracles as these? Nay, though I give No credence, the deed now must needs be done. So many things of power work here as one: The God's command; grief for my father slain; And mine own beggary urgeth me amain, That never shall these Argives, famed afar, High conquerors of Troy in joyous war Cower to . . . two women. For he bears, I know, A woman's heart. . . . If not, this day will show.

[He kneels at the Grave: ELECTRA kneels opposite him and the CHORUS gather behind.

CHORUS.

Ye great Apportioners of God,

The road of Righteousness make straight:

"For tongue of hate be tongue of hate
Made perfect": thus, as falls her rod,
God's justice crieth: "For the blow

Of death the blow of death atone."

"On him that doeth shall be done":
Speaks a grey word of long ago.

ORESTES.

[Strophe 1

O Father, Father of Doom,
What word, what deed from me,
Can waft afar to the silent room
Where thy sleep holdeth thee

318-343 THE CHOEPHOROE

A light that shall rend thy gloom?
Yet surely, the tale is told,
That tears are comfort beneath the tomb
To the great Kings of old.

LEADER.

[Strophe 2

No fire ravening red,
O Son, subdueth quite
The deep life of the dead;
His wrath breaks from the night.
When they weep for one who dies
His Avenger doth arise,
Yea, for father and life-giver
There is Justice, when the cries
And the tears run as a river.

ELECTRA.

[Antistrophe 1

O Father, hearken and save,
For my sore sorrow's sake!
Children twain are above thy grave
Seeking for thee: Oh, wake!
Thy grave is their only home,
The beggared and out-cast.
What here is well? What is saved from doom?
O Atê strong to the last!

CHORUS.

Yet still it may be—God is strong— A changèd music shall be born To sound above this dirge forlorn, And the King's House with Triumph-song Lead home a Friend in love new-sworn.

THE CHOEPHOROE 344-365

ORESTES.

[Strophe 3

Would that in ancient days,

Father, some Lycian lance

Had slain thee by Ilion's wall;

Then hadst thou left great praise

In thy House, and thy children's glance

In the streets were marked of all:

Men had upreared for thee

A high-piled burial hill

In a land beyond the sea;

And the House could have borne its ill.

LEADER.

[Antistrophe 2

And all they who nobly died
Would have loved him in that place,
And observed him in his pride
As he passed with royal pace
To a throne at the right hand
Of the Kings of the Dark Land:
For a king he was when living,
Above all who crowned stand
With the sceptre of lawgiving.

ELECTRA.

[Antistrophe 3

Nay, would thou hadst died not ever!

Not by the Ilian Gate,

Not when the others fell

Spear-broken beside the river!

If they who wrought thee hate

Had died, it had all been well:

366-388 THE CHOEPHOROE

A strange death, full of fear, That the folk beyond far seas Should enquire thereof, and hear; Not of our miseries!

Chorus.

My daughter, rare as gold is rare,
And blither than the skies behind
The raging of the northern wind
Are these thy prayers: for what is prayer?
Yet, be thou sure, this twofold scourge
Is heard: it pierceth to the verge
Of darkness, and your helpers now
Are wakening. These encharioted
Above us, lo, their hand is red!
Abhorrèd are they by the dead;
But none so hates as he and thou!

ORESTES.

[Strophe 4

Ah me, that word, that word
Stabbeth my heart, as a sword!
God, God, who sendest from below
Blind vengeance in the wake
Of sin, what deed have I to do,
With hand most weak and full of woe?
'Tis for my father's sake!

LEADER.

Strophe 5

May it be mine, may it be mine, To dance about the blazing pine Crying, crying, "A man is slain, a woman dying!"

THE CHOEPHOROE 389-410

It hideth in my bosom's core,

It beats its wings for death, for death,

A bitter wind that blows before

The prow, a hate that festereth,

A thing of horror, yet divine!

ELECTRA.

[Antistrophe 4

Zeus of the orphan, when
Wilt lift thy hand among men?
Let the land have a sign. Be strong,
And smite the neck from the head.
I ask for right after much wrong.
Hear me, O God! Hark to my song,
Ye Princedoms of the Dead!

CHORUS.

'Tis written: the shed drop doth crave
For new blood. Yea, the murdered cry
Of dead men shrieketh from the grave
To Her who out of sins gone by Makes new sin, that the old may die.

ORESTES.

[Strophe 6

How? Are ye dumb, Ye Princedoms of the Dead?

O Curses of Them that perish, come hither, hither!

Look on this wreck of kings, the beaten head,

Bowed in despair, roofless, disherited!

Whither to turn, O Lord Zeus? Whither, hither to turn, O Lord Zeus? Whither whither?

LEADER.

[Antistrophe 5

My heart, my heart is tossed again To see thee yielded up to pain,

411-432 THE CHOEPHOROE

Failing, failing;
Then mist is on my eyes and wailing
About mine ears, and tears as rain.
But when once more I look on thee
With power exalted, sudden-swift
A hope doth all my burden lift,
And light, and signs of things to be.

ELECTRA. [Antistrophe 6] What best shall pierce thine ear; the wrongs she what best shall pierce thine ear; the wrongs she wrought,

Wrought upon us, upon us, she and none other? Oh, fawn and smile: but the wrongs shall soften not, Wrongs with a wolfish heart, by a wolf begot:

They see no smile, they reck not the name of

They see no smile, they reck not the name of Mother!

CHORUS. Strophe 7

With the dirge of Aghatana I beat my breast:

Like the Keeners of Kissia, I make songs of pain.

Lo, yearning of arms abundant, east and west:

Tearing they smite, again and yet again, From above, from high; yea, God hath smitten red This bitter bleeding bosom, this bended head.

ELECTRA.

[Strophe 8

Ho, Mother! Ho, thou, Mother,
Mine enemy, daring all!
What burial made ye here?
His people followed not,
Mourned him not, knew him not:
Enemies bare his pall:
His wife shed no tear!

THE CHOEPHOROE 433-45

ORESTES.

[Strophe 9

All, all dishonour, so thy story telleth it!

And for that dishonour shall the woman pay,

As the gods have willed it, as my right hand willeth it!

Then Death may take me, let me only slay!

LEADER.

[Antistrophe 9

His hands and feet, they were hacked away from him!

Yea, she that buried him, she wrought it so.

To make thy life blasted, without help or stay from him.

Thou hast it all, the defiling and shame and woe!

[Orestes breaks down in speechless tears.

ELECTRA.

[Antistrophe 7

Thou tellest the doom he died, but I saw him not; I was far off, dishonoured and nothing worth.

Like a dog they drove me back, and the door was shut,

And alone I poured my tears to him through the earth.

I laughed not, yet rejoiced that none saw me weep.—Write this in thine heart, O Father; grave it deep.

LEADER.

[Antistrophe 8

Write! Yea, and draw the word
Deep unto that still land
Where thy soul dwells in peace.
What is, thou hast this day heard;

What shall be, reach forth thine hand

453-463 THE CHOEPHOROE

And take it! Be hard, be hard To smite and not cease!

(ORESTES, ELECTRA, and the LEADER.)

ORESTES. [Strophe 10 Thee, thee I call. Father, be near thine own.

ELECTRA.

I also cry thee, choked with the tears that flow.

LEADER.

Yea, all this band, it crieth to thee as one.

ALL.

O great King, hear us. Awake thee to the sun. Be with us against thy foe!

ORESTES. [Antistrophe 10 The slayer shall meet the slayer, wrong smite with wrong.

ELECTRA.

O Zeus, bless thou the murder to be this day!

LEADER.

(Dost hear? Oh, fear is upon me and trembling strong.)

ALL.

The day of Fate is old, it hath lingered long;
It cometh to them that pray.

THE CHOEPHOROE 464-486

DIVERS WOMEN. [Strophe II

-Alas, alas, for the travail born in the race,

-Alas for the harp of Ate, whose strings run blood,

—The beaten bosom, the grief too wild to bear.

-The pain, that gnaweth, and will not sink to sleep.

Antistrophe 11

The House hath healing for its own bitterness;

—It is here within. None other can stay the flood;

—Through bitter striving, through hate and old despair.

—Behold the Song of the Daemons of the deep!

ORESTES.

O Father mine, O most unkingly slain, Grant me the lordship of thy House again.

ELECTRA.

A boon for me likewise, O Father, give; To lay Aigisthos in his blood and live.

ORESTES.

So men shall honour thee with wassail high; Else without meat or incense shalt thou lie, Unhonoured when the dead their banquets call.

ELECTRA.

And I will pour thee offerings wondrous fair From my stored riches for a marriage-prayer, And this thy grave will honour more than all.

487-497 THE CHOEPHOROE

ORESTES.

Send back, O Earth, my sire to comfort me.

ELECTRA.

In power, in beauty, Great Persephone!

ORESTES.

Remember, Father, how they laved thee there!

ELECTRA.

Remember the strange weaving thou didst wear!

ORESTES.

A snarèd beast in chains no anvil wrought!

ELECTRA.

In coiled webs of shame and evil thought!

ORESTES.

Scorn upon scorn! Oh, art thou wakened?

ELECTRA.

Dost rear to sunlight that beloved head?

ORESTES.

Or send thine helping Vengeance to the light To aid the faithful: or let even fight Be joined in the same grapple as of yore, If, conquered, thou wouldst quell thy conqueror.

THE CHOEPHOROE 498-515

ELECTRA.

Yet one last cry: O Father, hear and save! Pity thy children cast upon thy grave: The woman pity, and the weeping man.

ORESTES.

And blot not out the old race that began With Pelops: and though slain thou art not dead!

ELECTRA.

Children are living voices for a head Long silent, floats which hold the net and keep The twisted line unfoundered in the deep.

ORESTES.

Listen: 'tis thou we weep for, none but thou: Thyself art saved if thou save us now.

LEADER.

Behold, ye have made a long and yearning praise, This sepulchre for unlamented days Requiting to the full. And for the rest, Seeing now thine heart is lifted on the crest Of courage, get thee to the deed, and see What power the Daemon hath which guardeth thee.

ORESTES.

So be it. Yet methinks to know one thing Were well. Why sent she this drink-offering? Hoped she by late atonement to undo That wrong eternal? A vain comfort, too,

516-530 THE CHOEPHOROE

Sent to one dead, and feeling not! My mind Stumbles to understand what lies behind These gifts, so puny for the deed she hath done. Yea, though man offer all he hath to atone For one life's blood, 'tis written, he hath lost That labour.—But enough. Say all thou know'st.

LEADER.

Son, I was near her, and could mark aright. A dream, a terror wandering in the night, Shook her dark spirit till she spoke that word.

ORESTES.

What was the dream she dreamed? Speak, if ye heard.

LEADER.

She bore to life, she said, a Serpent Thing.

ORESTES.

And after? To its head thy story bring.

LEADER.

In swathing clothes she lapt it like a child.

ORESTES.

It craved for meat, that dragon of the wild?

LEADER.

Yes; in the dream she gave it her own breast.

ORESTES.

And took no scathing from the evil beast?

THE CHOEPHOROE 531-551

LEADER.

The milk ran into blood. So deep it bit.

ORESTES.

The dream is come. The man shall follow it.

LEADER.

And she, amazed, came shrieking out of sleep; And many a torch, long blinded in the deep Of darkness, in our chambers burst afire To cheer the Queen. Then spake she her desire, To send, as a swift medicine for the dread That held her, these peace offerings to the dead.

ORESTES.

Behold, I pray this everlasting Earth,
I pray my father's grave, they bring to birth
In fullness all this dream. And here am I
To read its heart and message flawlessly.
Seeing that this serpent, born whence I was born,
Wore the same swathing-bands these limbs had worn,
Fanged the same breast that suckled me of yore,
And through the sweet milk drew that gout of gore;
And seeing she understood, and sore afeared
Shrieked: therefore it must be that, having reared
A birth most ghastly, she in wrath shall die:
And I, the beast, the serpent, even I Shall slay her! Be it so. The dream speaks clear.

LEADER.

I take thyself for mine interpreter, And pray that this may be. But speak thy will Who shall be doing, say, and who be still?

552-576 THE CHOEPHOROE

ORESTES.

'Tis simply told. This woman makes her way Within, and ye my charges shall obey, That they who slew by guile a man most rare, By guile, and snarèd in the self-same snare, May die, as Lord Apollo hath foretold, Loxias the Seer, who never failed of old.

First, I array me in a stranger's guise, With all the gear of travel, and likewise This man—their guest and battle-guest of yore! Then hither shall we come, and stand before The courtyard gate, and call. Aye, we will teach Our tongues an accent of Parnassian speech, Like men in Phôkis born. And say, perchance None of the warders with glad countenance Will ope to us, the House being so beset With evil: aye, what then? Then obdurate We shall wait on, till all who pass that way Shall make surmise against the House, and say "What ails Aigisthos? Wherefore doth he close His door against the traveller, if he knows And is within?" So comes it, soon or late, I cross the threshold of the courtyard gate, And entering find him on my father's throne. . . . Or, say he is abroad and comes anon, And hears, and calls for me-and there am I Before him, face to face and eye to eye; "Whence comes the traveller?" ere he speaks it, dead

I lay him, huddled round this leaping blade! Then shall the Curse have drunken of our gore Her third, last, burning cup, and thirst no more. Therefore go thou within, and watch withal That all this chance may well and aptly fall. For you, I charge ye of your lips take heed: Good words or silence, as the hour may need. While One Below his counsel shall afford And ope to me the strait way of the sword.

[ORESTES and PYLADES depart, ELECTRA goes into the House.

Chorus.

[Strophe 1

Host on host, breedeth Earth
Things of fear and ghastly birth;
Arm on arm spreads the Sea
That full of coilèd horrors be;
And fires the sky doth multiply;
And things that crawl, and things that fly,
And they that are born in the wind can tell of the perils
Of tempest and the Wrath on high.

[Antistrophe 1

But, ah, the surge over-bold
Of man's passion who hath told?
Who the Love, wild as hate,
In woman's bosom desperate,
Roaming slow through fields of Woe?
Where lives of mortals linked go
The heart of a woman is perilous past all perils
Of stars above or deeps below.

[Strophe 2

Wist ye not, O light of mind, Her who slew her son with hate, Thestios' daughter desolate,

605-635 THE CHOEPHOROE

How she wrought All her thought
To one counsel, fiery-blind,
When she burned the brand of fate,
That was twin to him and brother
From the hour of that first cry
When the babe came from the mother
Till the strong man turned to die?

[Antistrophe 2

Wist ye not one loathed of old,
Who to win a foe did sell,
Cruel, him who loved her well;
Skylla, dyed with blood and pride,
Who craved the rings of Cretan gold
That Minos gave, too rich to tell;
Like a wolf at night she came
Where he lay with tranquil breath,
And she cut the Crest of Flame:
And, a-sudden, all was death.

[Strophe 3

But o'er all terrors on man's tongue
The woman's deed of Lemnos lies;
It echoes, like an evil song,
Far off, and whensoe'er there rise
New and strange sins, in dire surmise,
Men mind them of the Lemnian wrong.
Yet surely by the Sin God's eye
Abhorreth, mortal man shall die,
And all the glory that was his.
For who shall lift that thing on high
Which God abaseth? Not amiss

THE CHOEPHOROE 636-648

I garner to my crown of woe These sins of Woman long ago.

[Antistrophe 3

O lust so old, so hard of heart!

I lose me in the stories told,
Untimely. Have these walls no part
In ravening of desire, as bold
And evil as those deeds of old?
The House with dread thereof doth start
From dreaming. On, through woe or weal
A woman brooding planned her path,
Against a warrior robed in steel,
And armies trembled at his wrath.
And he is gone; and we must kneel
On a cold hearth and bow in fear
Before a woman's trembling spear.

[Strophe 4

Lo, the sword hovereth at the throat
For Justice' sake. It scorneth not
What the proud man to earth has trod.
Its edge is bitter to the bone;
It stabbeth on, thro' iron, thro' stone,
Till it reach him who hath forgot
That Ruth which is the law of God.

[Antistrophe 4

For Justice is an oak that yet
Standeth; and Doom the Smith doth whet
His blade in the dark. But what is this?
A child led to the House from lands
Far off, and blood upon his hands!
The great Erinys wreaks her debt,
Whose thought is as the vast abyss.

649-663 THE CHOEPHOROE

The scene now represents the front of the Palace of the Atridae, with one door leading to the main palace, another to the IVomen's House. Dusk is approaching.

[Enter Orestes and Pylades, disguised as merchants from Phôkis, with Attendants.

ORESTES.

Ho, Warder! Hear! One knocketh at your gate!...
Ho, Warder, yet again! I knock and wait....

A third time, ye within! I call ye forth; Or counts your lord the stranger nothing worth?

A PORTER (within, opening the main door).

Enough! I hear. What stranger and wherefrom?

ORESTES.

Go, rouse your masters. 'Tis to them I come, Bearing great news. And haste, for even now Night's darkling chariot presseth to the brow Of heaven, and wayfarers like us must find Quick anchorage in some resthouse for our kind. Let one come forth who bears authority; A woman, if God will; but if it be A man, 'twere seemlier. With a woman, speech Trembles and words are blinded. Man can teach Man all his purpose and make clear his thought.

[Enter CLYTEMNESTRA from the House.

THE CHOEPHOROE 664-686

CLYTEMNESTRA.

Strangers, your pleasure? If ye have need of aught

All that beseems this House is yours to-day, Warm bathing and the couch that soothes away Toil, and the tendering of righteous eyes. Else, if ye come on some grave enterprise, That is man's work; and I will find the man.

ORESTES.

I come from Phôkis, of the Daulian clan, And, travelling hither, bearing mine own load Of merchandise, toward Argos, as the road Branched, there was one who met me, both of us

Strangers to one another: Strophius, A Phocian prince, men called him. On we strode Together, till he asked me of my road And prayed me thus: "Stranger, since other care Takes thee to Argos, prithee find me there The kin of one Orestes. . . . Plainly said Is best remembered: tell them he is dead. Forget not. And howe'er their choice may run, To bear his ashes home, or leave their son In a strange grave, in death an exile still, Discover, and bring back to me their will. Tell them his ashes lie with me, inurned In a great jar of bronze, and richly mourned." So much I tell you straight, being all I heard. Howbeit, I know not if I speak my word To the right hearers, princes of this old Castle. Methinks his father should be told.

687-711 THE CHOEPHOROE

CLYTEMNESTRA.

Ah me,
So cometh the last wreck in spite of all!
Curse of this House, thou foe that fear'st no fall,
How dost thou spy my hidden things and mar
Their peace with keen-eyed arrows from afar,
Till all who might have loved me, all, are gone!
And now Orestes; whom I had thought upon
So wisely, walking in free ways, his gait
Unsnarèd in this poison-marsh of hate!
The one last hope, the healing and the prayer
Of this old House, 'twas writ on empty air!

ORESTES.

For me, in a great House and favoured thus
By fortune, 'tis by tidings prosperous
I fain were known and welcomed. Pleasantest
Of all ties is the tie of host and guest.
But my heart told me 'twere a faithless thing
To fail a comrade in accomplishing
His charge, when I had pledged both word and hand.

CLYTEMNESTRA.

Not for our sorrow shall thy portion stand The lowlier, nor thyself be less our friend. Another would have told us; and the end Is all one. But 'tis time that strangers who Have spent long hours in travel should have due Refreshment. Ho, there! Lead him to our broad Guest-chambers, and these comrades of his road Who follow. See they find all comfort there

THE CHOEPHOROE 712-729

To assuage their way-worn bodies. And have care That in their tendance naught be found amiss.

Ourselves shall with our Lord consult of this Distress, and, having yet good friends, who know My heart, take counsel how to affront the blow.

[CLYTEMNESTRA goes back into the Women's House; Attendants lead Orestes and his followers through the main door.

LEADER.

Ye handmaidens, arise, be bold:
See if our moving lips have power
To aid Orestes in his hour;
For sure ye loved this House of old.

Chorus.

Thou holy Earth, thou holy shore
Beyond the grave, where rests his head
The Lord of Ships, the King, the Dead,
Now list, now aid, or never more!
The hour is full. The Guileful Word
Descends to wrestle for the right,
And Hermes guards the hour of night
For him that smiteth with the sword.

[The Nurse enters from the Women's House, weeping.

LEADER.

The stranger works some mischief, it would seem! Yonder I see Orestes' Nurse, a-stream With tears.—How now, Kilissa, whither bound, And Grief the unbidden partner of thy round?

730-758 THE CHOEPHOROE

Nurse.

The mistress bids me call Aigisthos here Quickly, to see these two, and learn more clear, As man from man, the truth of what they tell. Oh, to us slaves she makes it pitiable And grievous, and keeps hid behind her eyes The leaping laughter. Aye, 'tis a rich prize For her, and for the House stark misery, This news the travellers tell so trippingly. And, Oh, Aigisthos, he, you may be sure, Will laugh to hear it!... Ah, I am a poor Old woman! Such a tangle as they were, The troubles in this House, and hard to bear, Long years back, and all aching in my breast! But none that hurt like this! Through all the rest...

Well, I was sore, but lived them down and smiled. But little Orestes, my heart's care, the child I took straight from his mother; and save me He had no other nurse! And, Oh, but he Could scream and order me to tramp the dark! Aye, times enough, and trouble enough, and stark Wasted at that! A small thing at the breast, That has no sense, you tend it like a beast, By guesswork. For he never speaks, not he, A babe in swaddling clothes, if thirst maybe Or hunger comes, or any natural need. The little belly takes its way. Indeed, 'Twas oft a prophet he wanted, not a nurse; And often enough my prophecies, of course, Came late; and then the heaps to wash and dry! And fuller's work as much as nurse's! Aye, I followed both trades, from the day when first

THE CHOEPHOROE 759-772

His father gave me Orestes to be nursed. . . . And now he is dead; and strangers come and tell The news to me. And this poor miserable Old woman must go tell the plunderer Who shames this house! Oh, glad he will be to hear!

LEADER.

How doth she bid him come? In what array?

Nurse.

I take thee not. . . What is it ye would say?

LEADER.

Comes he with spears to guard him or alone?

Nurse.

She bids him bring the spearmen of the throne.

LEADER.

Speak not that bidding to our loathed Lord! "Alone, quick, fearing nothing" is the word. So speak, and in thy heart let joy prevail! The teller straighteneth many a crooked tale.

Nurse.

What ails thee? Are these tidings to thy mind?

LEADER.

The wind is cold, but Zeus may change the wind.

Nurse.

How, when Orestes, our one hope, is dead?

773-787 THE CHOEPHOROE

LEADER.

Not yet! So much the dullest seer can read.

Nurse.

What mean'st thou? There is something ye have heard!

LEADER.

Go, tell thy tale. Obey thy mistress' word! God, where He guardeth, guardeth faithfully.

Nurse.

I go.—May all be well, God helping me!

[The Nurse goes out

CHORUS.

[Strophe 1

- Lo, I pray God, this day:
 Father of Olympus, hear!
 Grant thy fortunes healingly
 Fall for them who crave to see
 In this House of lust and fear,
 Purity, purity.
- I have sinned not, I have spoken In the name of Law unbroken; Zeus, as thou art just, we pray thee Be his guard!

ALL.

There is One within the Gate Of his foemen, where they wait; Oh, prefer him, Zeus, before them

THE CHOEPHOROE 788-803

And exalt and make him great:
Two- and threefold shall he pay thee
Love's reward.

[Antistrophe 1

— Seest thou one lost, alone,
Child of him who loved thee well?
As a young steed he doth go,
Maddened, in the yoke of woe:
Oh, set measure on the swell,
Forth and fro, forth and fro,
Of the beating hoofs that bear him
Through this bitter course. Oh, spare him!
By his innocence we pray thee
Be his guard!

ALL.

There is One within the Gate
Of his foemen, where they wait;
Oh, prefer him, Zeus, before them
And exalt and make him great:
Two- and threefold shall he pay thee
Love's reward.

Strophe 2

Gods of the treasure-house within,
 One-hearted, where the bronzen door
 On darkness gloateth and on gold:
 With present cleansing wash the old
 Blight of this house: and aged Sin
 Amid the gloom shall breed no more!

ALL.

And, O light of the Great Cavern, let it be That this Man's house look up again, and see,

804-823 THE CHOEPHOROE

Till the dead veil of scorn And long darkness shall be torn, And the kind faces shine and old Argolis be free!

[Antistrophe 2

— And, Oh, let Hermes, Maia-born,
Be near, who moveth in his kind,
As the wind blows, to help at need:
The word he speaketh none may read:
Before his eyes the Day is torn
With darkness and the Night is blind.

ALL.

And, O Light of the Great Cavern, let it be That this Man's house look up again, and see, Till the dead veil of scorn And long darkness shall be torn, And the kind faces shine and old Argolis be free!

[Strophe 3

Then, then the prison shall unclose:
A wind of Freedom stream above:
A flood which faileth not, a voice
Telling of women that rejoice,
One harp in many souls, one spell
Enchanted. Ho, the ship goes well!
For me, for me, this glory grows,
And Evil flies from those I love.

ALL.

Oh, in courage and in power, When the deed comes and the hour,

THE CHOEPHOROE 824-841

As she crieth to thee "Son"

Let thy "Father" quell her breath !

But a stroke and it is done,

The unblamed deed of death.

[Antistrophe 3

— The heart of Perseus, darkly strong,

Be lifted in thy breast to-day:

For them thou lovest in the grave,

For them on Earth, be blind, be brave:

Uphold the cloak before thine eyes

And see not while thy Gorgon dies;

But him who sowed the seed of wrong,

Go, look him in the face and slay!

ALL.

Oh, in courage and in power,
When the deed comes and the hour,
As she crieth to thee "Son,"
Let thy "Father" quell her breath!
But a stroke and it is done,
The unblamed deed of death.

[Enter from the country Aigisthos.

AIGISTHOS.

A message called me; else I scarce had thought
To have come so quick. 'Tis a strange rumour, brought,
They tell me by some Phosian wayfarer.

They tell me, by some Phocian wayfarers In passing: strange, nor grateful to our ears. Orestes dead! A galling load it were And dripping blood for this poor House to bear,

842-864 THE CHOEPHOROE

Still scored and festerous with its ancient wound. How shall I deem it? Living truth and sound? Or tales of women, born to terrify, That wildly leap, and up in mid-air die? What know ye further? I would have this clear.

LEADER.

We heard the tale; but go within and hear With thine own ears A rumoured word hath weak Force, when the man himself is there to speak.

AIGISTHOS

Hear him I will, and question him beside.
Was this man with Orestes when he died,
Or speaks he too from rumour? If he lies...
He cannot cheat a mind that is all eyes.

[He enters the House.

CHORUS.

Zeus, Zeus, how shall I speak, and how Begin to pray thee and beseech? How shall I ever mate with speech This longing, and obtain my vow?

The edges of the blades that slay Creep forth to battle: shall it be Death, death for all eternity, On Agamemnon's House this day;

Or sudden a new light of morn,
A beacon fire for freedom won,
The old sweet rule from sire to son,
And golden Argolis reborn?

THE CHOEPHOROE 865-883

Against two conquerors all alone, His last death-grapple, deep in blood, Orestes joineth. . . . O great God, Give victory!

[Death-cry of Aigisthos within.

LEADER.

How? What is wrought? Stand further from the door

Till all is over. Move apart before Men mark, and deem us sharers in the strife. For after this 'tis war, for death or life.

> [The Women stand back almost unseen. A Household Slave rushes out from the main Door. and beats at the door of the Women's House.

SLAVE.

Ho!
Treason! Our master! Treason! Haste amain!
Treason within. Aigisthos lieth slain.
Unbar, unbar, with all the speed ye may
The women's gates! Oh, tear the bolts away!...
God, but it needs a man, a lusty one,
To help us, when all time for help is gone!
What ho!
I babble to deaf men, and labouring cry,
To ears sleep-charmèd, words that fail and die.
Where art thou, Clytemnestra? What dost thou?...
'Fore God, 'tis like to be her own neck now,
In time's revenge, that shivers to its fate.

[Enter CLYTEMNESTRA.

884-897 THE CHOEPHOROE

CLYTEMNESTRA.

What wouldst thou? Why this clamour at our gate?

SLAVE.

The dead are risen, and he that liveth slain.

CLYTEMNESTRA.

Woe's me! The riddle of thy speech is plain. By treason we shall die, even as we slew. . . . Ho, there, mine axe of battle! Let us try Who conquereth and who falleth, he or I! . . . To that meseemeth we are come, we two.

[Enter from the House ORESTES with drawn sword.

ORESTES.

'Tis thou I seek. With him my work is done.

CLYTEMNESTRA (suddenly failing).

Woe's me! Aigisthos, my beloved, my gallant one!

ORESTES.

Thou lovest him! Go then and lay thine head Beside him. Thou shalt not betray the dead [Makes as if to stab her.

CLYTEMNESTRA.

Hold, O my son! My child, dost thou not fear To strike this breast? Hast thou not slumbered here, Thy gums draining the milk that I did give?

THE CHOEPHOROE $98-912

ORESTES (lowering his sword).

Pylades!

What can I? Dare I let my mother live?

PYLADES.

Where is God's voice from out the golden cloud At Pytho? Where the plighted troth we vowed? Count all the world thy foe, save God on high.

ORESTES.

I will obey. Thou counsellest righteously.— Follow! Upon his breast thou shalt expire Whom, living, thou didst hold above my sire. Go, lie in his dead arms!... This was the thing Thou lovedst, loathing thine anointed King.

CLYTEMNESTRA.

I nursed thee. I would fain grow old with thee.

ORESTES.

Shall one who slew my father house with me?

CLYTEMNESTRA.

Child, if I sinned, Fate had her part therein.

ORESTES.

Then Fate is here, with the reward of sin.

CLYTEMNESTRA.

Thou reck'st not of a Mother's Curse, my child?

ORESTES.

Not hers who cast me out into the wild.

913-923 THE CHOEPHOROE

CLYTEMNESTRA.

Cast out? I sent thee to a war-friend's Hall.

ORESTES.

A free man's heir, ye sold me like a thrall.

CLYTEMNESTRA.

If thou wast sold, where is the price I got?

ORESTES.

The price!... For very shame I speak it not.

CLYTEMNESTRA.

Speak. But tell, too, thy father's harlotries.

ORESTES.

Judge not the toiler, thou who sitt'st at ease!

CLYTEMNESTRA.

A woman starves with no man near, my son.

ORESTES.

Her man's toil wins her bread when he is gone

CLYTEMNESTRA.

To kill thy mother, Child: is that thy will?

ORESTES.

I kill thee not: thyself it is doth kill.

CLYTEMNESTRA.

A mother hath her Watchers: think and quail!

THE CHOEPHOROE 924-936

ORESTES.

How shall I 'scape my Father's if I fail?

CLYTEMNESTRA (to herself). Living, I cry for mercy to a tomb!

ORESTES.

Yea, from the grave my father speaks thy doom

CLYTEMNESTRA.

Ah God! The serpent that I bare and fed!

ORESTES.

Surely of truth prophetic is the dread That walketh among dreams. Most sinfully Thou slewest: now hath Sin her will of thee.

[He drives CLYTEMNESTRA before him into the Palace. The CHORUS come forward again.

LEADER.

For these twain also in their fall I weep. Yet, seeing Orestes now through mire so deep Hath climbed the crest, I can but pray this eye Of the Great House be not made blind and die.

CHORUS.

[Strophe 1

Judgment came in the end
To Troy and the Trojans' lord,
(O Vengeance, heavy to fall!)
There came upon Atreus' Hall

937-956 THE CHOEPHOROE

Lion and lion friend,
A sword came and a sword.
A walker in Pytho's way
On the neck of her kings hath trod,
A beggar and outcast, yea,
But led by God.

[Antistrophe 1

Came He of the laughing lure,
The guile and the secret blow,
(O Vengeance, subtle to slay!)
But there held his hand that day
The Daughter of Zeus, the pure,
Justice yelept below.
Justice they called her name,
For where is a goodlier?
And her breath is a sword of flame
On the foes of her.

ALL.

Cry, Ho for the perils fled,
For the end of the long dismay!
Cry, Ho for peace and bread;
For the Castle's lifted head,
For the two defilers dead,
And the winding of Fortune's way!

Even as Apollo gave [Strophe 2]
His charge on the Mountain, He
Who holdeth the Earth-heart Cave,
Hast thou wrought innocently
Great evil, hindered long,
Tracking thy mother's sin . . .
Is the power of God hemmed in

THE CHOEPHOROE 957-970

So strangely to work with wrong?

Howbeit, let praise be given

To that which is throned in Heaven:

The Gods are strong.

[Antistrophe 2

And soon shall the Perfect Hour
O'er the castle's threshold stone
Pass with his foot of power,
When out to the dark is thrown
The sin thereof and the stain
By waters that purify.
Now, now with a laughing eye
God's fortune lieth plain;
And a cry on the wind is loud:
"The stranger that held us bowed
Is fallen again!"

ALL.

O light of the dawn to be!
The curb is broken in twain,
And the mouth of the House set free.
Up, O thou House, and see!
Too long on the face of thee
The dust hath lain!

[The doors are thrown open, and Orestes discovered standing over the dead bodies of Aigisthos and Clytemnestra. The Household is grouped about him and Attendants hold the great red robe in which Agumemnon was murdered.

971-999 THE CHOEPHOROE

ORESTES (He speaks with ever-increasing excitement).

Behold your linked conquerors! Behold My Father's foes, the spoilers of the fold! Oh, lordly were these twain, when throned high, And lovely now, as he who sees them lie Can read, two lovers faithful to their troth! They vowed to slay my father, or that both As one should die, and both the vows were true And mark, all ye who hear this tale of rue, This robe, this trap that did my father greet, Irons of the hand and shackling of the feet! Outstretch it north and south: cast wide for me This man-entangler, that our Sire may sec-Not mine, but He who watcheth all deeds done, Yea, all my mother's wickedness, the Sun-And bear me witness, when they seek some day To judge me, that in justice I did slay This woman: for of him I take no heed. He hath the adulterer's doom, by law decreed. But she who planned this treason 'gainst her own Husband, whose child had lived beneath her zone-Oh, child of love, now changed to hate and blood !-What is she? Asp or lamprey of the mud, That, fangless, rotteth with her touch, so dire That heart's corruption and that lust like fire? Woman? Not woman, though I speak right fair.

[His eyes are caught by the great red robe.

A dead man's winding-sheet? A hunter's snare? A trap, a toil, a tangling of the feet. . . . I think a thief would get him this, a cheat

THE CHOEPHOROE 1000-1020

That robs the stranger. He would snare them so, And kill them, kill them, and his heart would glow... Not in my flesh, not in my house, O God, May this thing live! Ere that, Oh, lift thy rod And smiting blast me, dead without a child!

[He stops exhausted.

CHORUS.

O deeds of anger and of pain!
O woman miserably slain!
Alas! Alas!
And he who lives shall grieve again.

ORESTES.

Did she the deed or no? This robe defiled Doth bear me witness, where its web is gored, How deep the dye was of Aigisthos' sword; And blood hath joined with the old years, to spoil The many tinctures of the broidered coil. Oh, now I weep, now praise him where he died, And calling on this web that pierced his side. . . . Pain, pain is all my doing, all my fate, My race, and my begetting: and I hate This victory that sears me like a brand. . . .

CHORUS.

No mortal thro' this life shall go For ever portionless of woe. Alas! Alas! It comes to all, or swift or slow.

ORESTES.

Yet wait: for I would have you understand. The end I know not. But methinks I steer

1021-1045 THE CHOEPHOROE

Unseeing, like some broken charioteer, By curbless visions borne. And at my heart A thing of terror knocketh, that will start Sudden a-song, and she must dance to hear. But while I am still not mad, I here declare To all who love me, and confess, that I Have slain my mother, not unrighteously; Who with my father's blood hath stained the sod Of Argos and drawn down the wrath of God. And the chief spell that wrought me to the deed Is Loxias, Lord of Pytho, who decreed His high commandment: if this thing I dare, He lays on me no sin: if I forbear... I cannot speak his judgment: none can know The deeps thereof, no arrow from the bow Out-top it. Therefore here ye see me, how I go prepared, with wreaths and olive bough, To kneel in supplication on the floor Of Loxias, touch the fire that evermore Men call the undying, and the midmost stone Of Earth, flying this blood which is mine own. And how these evil things were wrought, I pray All men of Argos on an after day Remember, and bear witness faithfully When Meneläus comes. . . . And take from me, Living or dead, a wanderer and outcast For ever, this one word, my last, my last. . . .

LEADER.

Nay, all is well. Leave no ill omen here, Nor bind upon thy lips the yoke of fear. All Argos thou hast freed, and with one sweep Two serpents' heads hurled recking to the deep.

THE CHOEPHOROE 1046-1060

ORESTES (overcome with sudden terror).

Ah! Ah!

Ye bondmaids! They are here: like Gorgons, gowned

In darkness; all bewreathed and interwound With serpents!... I shall never rest again.

LEADER.

What fantasies, most father-loved of men, Haunt thee? Be strong, thou conqueror! Have no fear!

ORESTES.

These are no fantasies. They are here; they are

The Hounds of my dead Mother, hot to kill.

LEADER

The blood upon thine hand is reeking still: For that the turmoil in thy heart is loud

ORESTES.

O Lord Apollo! More and more they crowd Close, and their eyes drip blood, most horrible!

LEADER.

One cleansing hast thou. Loxias can quell Thy tempest with his touch, and set thee free.

ORESTES.

You cannot see them. I alone can see. I am hunted. . . . I shall never rest again.

[Exit ORESTES.

1061-1074 THE CHOEPHOROE

CHORUS.

- Farewell. May blessing guide thee among men.

— May God with love watch over thee, and heed Thy goings and be near thee at thy need.

ALL.

Behold a third great storm made wild
By winds of wrath within the race,
Hath shook this castle from its place.
The ravin of the murdered child
First broke Thyestes in his pride:
Second, a warrior and a King,
Chief of Achaia's warfaring,
Was smitten in the bath and died.
And Third, this Saviour or this last
Doom from the deep. What end shall fall,
Or peace, or death outsweeping all,
When night comes and the Wrath is past?

[Exeunt.

The beginning of this play is lost, through an injury to the single MS on which it depends. The MS only begins at "Ha, what sight is this?" which is conventionally numbered l. 10, though probably there were at least twenty or thirty lines preceding it. Curiously enough, three passages from the missing part are quoted by different ancient authors, so that a good deal of it can be supplied.

- P. 15, l. 2, The meaning of this phrase was obscure even to Aeschylus' contemporaries, and is discussed in Aristophanes' Frogs 1126 ff. It seems to mean that Hermês Psychopompos (Guide of the Dead) is son of Zeus Chthonios (Zeus of the Underworld). "Saviour" and "Help in War" are other titles of Hermês.
- P. 16, l. 6, Înachos: The river of Argos. So Achilles on reaching manhood cut off his long hair as a gift to the River Spercheios. Rivers in a land subject to drought were worshipped as "life-giving" or "rearers of young men" (κουροτρόφοι).
- P. 17, l. 22, CHORUS: The Chorus are slave women taken in war. We know no more of them. They certainly do not seem to be Trojans, and, like the Nurse later, they have the feelings of loyal old retainers towards the House, hating Aigisthos and loving the memory of Agamemnon. Throughout the play Aigisthos is represented as a usurper and a tyrant, holding his rule by fear. Cf. (ll. 885 ff., 935 ff.) the exultant tone of the two last choruses.

- P. 17, l. 32, "Dread, very dread": Clytemnestra had a dangerous dream. If she had gone at once to a skilled interpreter, he might possibly have given it a favourable interpretation and thus partly averted the consequences. Instead of this she shrieked in terror. That shriek was itself an interpretation which could never be explained away. The prophets, when consulted, explained that the dream came from the anger of Agamemnon, and Clytemnestra then made the fatal mistake of sending offerings to his grave to appease his wrath. This was far too slight a thing to appease him; but it did awake him, and so enabled him to help his avengers.
- P. 18, l. 61, "Who knows the great Wheel's swing," etc.: A difficult passage. It seems to mean that justice (i.e. both retribution to the sinner and reparation to the sinned-against) sometimes comes quick and clear; sometimes is long delayed, and sometimes is wrapt in night, i.e. no one can say for certain whether it comes at all.
- P. 19, l. 84, Electra feels that it is a mockery, and perhaps an impiety, to pour the peace-offerings of the murderess. The Leader urges her not to hesitate, but deliberately to use the offerings as an appeal for vengeance. The thought at first appals her, but she nerves herself to it. In her prayer she deliberately tells her father the things that will most sting him into wakefulness. The passage "I lay these tokens down," seems to mean that she puts upon the grave stones or some other objects to act as a perpetual reminder and keep her prayer alive.

P. 22, l. 151, Chorus: "Let fall the tear," etc.: The grave is a barrier-stone between the dead and the living, a "turner-back of Evil as of Good"; yet not absolutely so. The prayers of his children, and the tears of their suffering, may after all get past the barriers and reach the "darkened heart" of the dead. This idea is in the essence of the play.

P. 23, Il. 165-210, Recognition scene. It was a traditional story that Electra had recognized Orestes by a lock of hair, a footprint, and a bit of weaving. Aristophanes (Clouds, 534 ff.) speaks of his comedy, "like Electra of old, recognizing its brother's tress" when it meets a spectator of true Attic taste. It would be a mistake to apply realist canons to this ancient tale. Among barefooted peoples family likenesses are apt to be chiefly traced in the feet and hair. Both Arab and Australian "trackers" are cited to this effect, as also is the Odyssey (iv. 148 fl., xix. 358, 381). See Tucker's Choephoroe, p. lxvi. It is interesting to note that Sophocles in his Electra omits the traditional signs altogether Euripides uses them, but uses them in a completely original way to illustrate Electra's state of mind. An old peasant tries to show the "signs" to her. She longs to believe that Orestes has come, but in fear of disappointment refuses to look at them and rejects every suggestion of comfort. See my version and note there. (P. 31 ff., ll. 508 548.)

P. 25, l. 211, "Torment of heart and blinding of the brain": Electra bows down and buries her face in her hands. When she next looks up, there is an armed man like her father standing just above her father's tomb. Note that she begins by refusing to believe. A motive which is afterwards deepened and elaborated by Euripides has been suggested by Aeschylus. See above.

- P. 29, Il. 269 ff., "Oh, Loxias shall not mock," etc.: Orestes at the end of the play goes mad; before that certain of his speeches are strangely violent and incoherent. Scholars have generally supposed the text to be exceptionally corrupt, but I think it will be found that this particular tone of incoherence never comes except when there is a mention of Delphi and Apollo's command. I think, therefore, that the wildness of these speeches is intentional, and the madness of the end does not come unprepared. It will be noticed in the last scene with what psychological daring as well as subtlety Aeschylus depicts the final collapse of his hero's reason.
- P. 29, l. 275, "The wild bull's way": Ought Orestes to accept a money payment to atone for his father's slaying, or, like a wild bull driven out from the herd, should he accept no peace but insist on a life for a life? The commutation of the blood-feud for a money payment was, of course, a softening of primitive manners. As such, it is elaborately provided for in various codes of early law. Yet, while it marks a social advance, at the same time it often involves a softening and weakening of the sense of duty in the individual. Orestes could probably have lived in comfort if he had been willing to accept a large blood-price from Aigisthos and say no more about it. He prefers, with all its misery and danger, the absolute fulfilment of his duty to his father. To us, and in this special case to Aeschylus, the rule of vengeance seems savage. We speak glibly of the "duty of forgiveness." But it should be remembered that we expect the police to arrest the offender and the judge to see that he is hanged. In Orestes' days men had to do justice on the wicked with their own hands, or else leave them unpunished and triumphant.

- P. 29, l. 290, "That bronze horror": The meaning is not known. It may be some instrument of torture, but more likely it is something intended to make a noise, like the bell sometimes worn by lepers in the Middle Ages, to warn people of the presence of the Accursed One.
- P. 30, Il. 315-510, The Invocation. This extraordinary scene is really the heart of the play and gives to the Choëphoroe a strange supernatural atmosphere which is absent from both the Electra plays. There is no invocation scene in Sophocles; there is a brief one in Euripides (Electra 671-685). It has great emotional effect but is only about 15 lines long and does not attempt to produce the cumulative impression of this scene, in which we feel human suffering and love gradually breaking through the barriers of death and earth and darkness. At the end the dead Agamemnon is awake, and Orestes hardly needs to think about the details of his dangerous plot. A power more than mortal is behind him. It will be noticed how the scene works up, like certain religious litanies, to a pitch of more and more overpowering and almost hysterical emotion: then, in the regular Greek manner, it descends again to something like calm.
- P. 33, l. 380, "Ah me, that word, that word": The thought that he himself hates his mother is what pierces Orestes' heart. In his next speech also he is bewildered. Not till l. 434, "All, all dishonour," does he lose all scruple in the storm of his passion.

- P. 35, ll. 428-442, "Ho, Mother; ho, thou, Mother, mine enemy!" First Electra tells of the shameful secret burial: this rouses Orestes to fury. Then the Leader tells of something worse. The murderess had mutilated the body; cut off the dead man's feet so that he could not pursue, and his hands so that he could not lay hold of her. This would make Agamemnon helpless, and so leave Orestes without hope. The unexpected abomination breaks Orestes down.—This device of terrified murderers is a piece of primitive magic. It is attributed to Clytemnestra by Sophocles (Electra 445), and to the witch Medea by Apollonius Rhodius.
- P. 38, l. 471, "The House hath healing," i.e. the House itself can cure bloodshed by bloodshed, sin by vengeance.
- P. 40, l. 510, "Behold, ye have made a long and yearning praise": The dead must surely now be satisfied. Even if neglected for years he has now had such a lamentation as requites him for all.
- P. 40, l. 515, "What power the Daemon hath which guardeth thee": The word Daemon has no connotation of evil in classical Greek.
- P. 41, l. 517, "One dead and feeling not!": Not strictly consistent perhaps with the invocation scene, but psychologically right. The dead are past feeling... unless something very extraordinary is done to make them feel. Then, who knows?
- P. 41, l. 527, Clytemnestra's dream that she gave birth to a serpent is traditional. It is found both before Aeschylus and after. The asps of Libya and divers other serpent things were "matricides"; at birth they tore and killed their mother. See Herodotus 3, 109; Euripides' Orestes 479.

- P. 43, l. 563, "An accent of Parnassian speech": It is interesting to note that there is no trace of Phocian dialect in Orestes' actual language later on. To make him talk broad Phocian would, according to convention, have made him "comic," like certain Bocotians, Spartans, and Scythians in Aristophanes. On the other hand, an oriental colour is often allowed in tragic language, especially in lyric passages, e.g. in Aeschylus' Persae.
- P. 43, l. 574, The reading is doubtful. I read μ^2 of for $\mu\omega$ and $\kappa\alpha\lambda\hat{\epsilon}\hat{\imath}\nu$ for $\beta\alpha\lambda\hat{\epsilon}\hat{\imath}\nu$.
 - P. 44, l. 583, "One Below": i.e. Agamemnon.
- P. 44, l. 585, Chorus: The sense of this chorus is often difficult and the text apparently corrupt, especially the end. "There are many terrible things, but none so terrible as a woman's passion; for instance (602), Althaea, daughter of Thestios, who slew her son Meleâger; or (612) Skylla of Megara who betrayed her father Nîsos; or (631) the Lemman women, who slew their husbands; and, after all (623—a stanza has been transposed) have we not an example here in Clytemnestra?"

Althaea: See Swinburne's Atulanta in Calydon. When her son Meleager was born she saw in the room the three Fates, one of whom foretold that Meleager should die when a red brand then burning in the fire was consumed. Althaea leapt out of bed and saved the brand. Afterwards, when Meleager fell in love with Atalanta, and in a feud on her behalf killed his mother's two brethren, she threw the brand into the fire.

Skylla: Skylla, daughter of Nîsos, King of Megara, whose life depended on a magic lock of hair. She fell in love with Minos, who was besieging Megara, and betrayed her father to him. The rings of Cretan gold were apparently a love-gift.

Lemnos: The native women of Lemnos in one night rose and killed their Greek husbands, perhaps because the men had left them for Thracian concubines, perhaps for other reasons. See Rise of the Greek Epic, Ed. 3, p. 56.

P. 47, l. 652, The time is now evening and the scene is in front of the castle of the Atreidae. In Aeschylus' time there was probably no actual change made in the stage arrangements. The back wall represented a palace front, while in the centre of the orchestra was an altar or mound which stood for Agamemnon's tomb. In the first half of the play you attended to the tomb and ignored the back scene: in the second you attended to the castle and ignored the mound.

Observe the delay before the door is opened. This increases the dramatic tension and at the same time makes us feel that the House is "beset with evil." An ordinary great house would be thrown open at the first knock.

P. 48, l. 668, The first entrance of Clytemnestra, about whom we have thought and talked so much, is immensely important. She comes unexpected, standing suddenly in the great doorway where we last saw her, with blood on her brow and an axe in her hands, standing over the dead bodies (Agamem-non 1372). Before that we had seen her in the same position, hardly less sinister, calling Cassandra to her death: "Thou, likewise, come within." (Agamemnon 1035.)

The first entrances of Clytemnestra in the two Electra plays are also striking •In Sophocles (Electra 516) she bursts in upon Electra, like a termagant, in a sudden agony of rage. In Euripides (Electra 998 ff.), when we have been led to expect a savage murderess, we meet "a sad, middle-aged woman whose first words are an apology, controlling quickly her old fires, anxious to be as little hated as possible."

- P. 48, l. 674. There is an almost reckless fluency about Orestes' speech. In his bitterness he treats the news of his death as a trifle, not showing, nor expecting from others, any particular emotion about it. As a matter of fact, it gives Clytemnestra a greater shock than he expected. There is no reason to doubt the general sincerity of her words. Of course, she feared Orestes and knew he was her enemy. When it comes to a fight she is ready. At the same time, she has, as shown in the last scenes of the Agamennon, an aching sense of disaster and friendlessness, and would like to think that, when all the rest of the House had gone under, the son she had sent away was living somewhere unhurt, and might perhaps be grateful to her. As it is, her old enemy, the Curse of the House, has beaten her.
- P. 51, ll. 731-782. This poignant and vivid scene of the old nurse, ludicrous in her tears, is a striking departure from the stately conventions of Greek tragedy. Neither Sophocles nor Euripides nas left any scene like it. Herakles in the Alcestis is pro-Satyric. The panic-stricken Phrygian slave in the Orestes (Orestes 1369–1530) is grotesque, but grotesquely horrible. In actual language the nurse's diction is on the whole tragic in colour and her metre correct: the grammar is rather loose and exclamatory. The name "Kilissa" (Cilician woman) suggests a slave.

- P. 53, ll. 783-837. Again the sense is difficult and the text extremely uncertain. The chorus pray in the name of their innocence and Agamemnon's long service to Zeus for pity; to the Gods of the Possessions of the House (Latin "penates," sometimes grouped together as Zeus Ktêsios) to help in the cleansing and rebuilding of the House (l. 800); to Apollo of the Cavern of Delphi, the God of Light, to help the House to light out of darkness (l. 812); to Hermês, the God of craft and secrecy, to help in a plot for the right (l. 819). The battle will be a battle of liberation from tyrants.
- P. 56, l. 827. Orestes should think of his duty to his father and forget all else. As Perseus when killing the Gorgon turned his eyes away lest her face should freeze him to stone, so let Orestes, when he meets his mother, veil his eyes and smite.
- P. 56, l. 838, AIGISTHOS: Just as they mention "him who sowed the seed of wrong," he enters. In a short but vivid scene we may perhaps see the man's harshness and confidence, but the truth is that in Aeschylus we are told almost nothing about Aigisthos except that Clytemnestra loved him.
- P. 57, ll. 855-874. The usual rather low-toned, prayerlike song broken in upon by the death-cry. (Cf. Agamemnon 1342, Euripides' Electra 1163, etc.)

The Chorus naturally shrink away from the house in order not to be involved in imminent danger. This also has the advantage that it leaves the scene empty, and the slave who rushes out in terror crying for help finds no one. I receive the impression that the scene is meant to be dark, which would imply that at the end of the play Orestes stood between men holding torches. There is wonderful power in this scene. There are no men to help; no women even; all the world is dumb and asleep. Then suddenly there is Clytemnestra.

P. 59, l. 886, "The dead are risen": A deliberately riddling line, in the Greek meaning either: "I tell thee the dead are slaying the living man," or "I tell thee the living man is slaying the dead."

P. 59, l. 893, "Aigisthos, my beloved": Up to this moment she has been ready to fight. The death of her beloved unstrings her. One would like to know whether Aeschylus meant her actually to have the axe and drop it, or whether Orestes is intended to come too soon. Note with what intensity even when the fight has gone out of her she fences for her life. Every line of the scene is charged with meaning and feeling. The thing that breaks her is the sudden realization (928) that this is the serpent of her dream. An interesting piece of technique which I have not tried to represent is here found in the original. Orestes' words in 927 are so arranged as to produce almost exactly the word "hisses" (σοὐρίζει for σοι δρίζει = συρίζει).

P. 61, Il. 920, "A woman starves": This is her first argument in Agamemnon 862 ff.: "That any woman thus should sit alone," etc.

- P. 62, Il. 935-972 Chorus: A short song of exultation. Justice has come both to Troy and to Argos. Hermês, the God of Guile, has done it, but Justice held his hand and he only did her will. We have had several times already the scruples of Orestes' conscience, but this is the first doubt expressed by the Chorus as to the righteousness of the mother-murder. "Is the power of God hemmed in so strangely to work with wrong?" All doubts, however, are swallowed up in joy at the liberation of Argos and the downfall of the tyrants.
- P. 65, l. 973-end. This marvellous scene scarcely needs comment. The showing of the robe in which Agamemnon was slain is, perhaps, imitated in the Forum Scene of Julius Caesar, which came Shakespeare direct from Plutarch's Lives (Brutus ch. 20, Anthony ch. 14). But the main interest here is in something quite different. The madness of which we have seen the approaching shadow now closes in upon Orestes. The first definite sign of it comes at l. 996, where, as Conington followed by Dr. Verrall pointed out, he tries to find a name to describe his mother. As he gropes for the word, the great crimson robe with the stains of blood obsesses his mind and he calls her "a winding-sheet, a snare, a net," and so on. (So Cassandra in Agamemnon 114 calls her "a net and a snare.") We may notice that "dead without a child" (1006) is a more awful curse in Greek than in English. He appears at this point to sink into speechlessness, only to rouse himself more fiercely at l. 1010: "Did she the deed or no?" The few low-toned lines of music by the Chorus add a great beauty to the scene.

P. 67, l. 1043. Orestes' last sentence is unfinished; as he was evidently going to leave behind him some word of bad omen, the Leader of the Chorus interrupts with words of comfort. As she mentions the "two serpents' heads" (1048) there is a cry of horror, and the "armed slayer" is seen appealing to the slave women to protect him. He has seen the shapes with snaky hair beginning to crowd upon him. The last touch of tragedy is in 1061 when he realizes that he is alone in his suffering ("You cannot see them; I alone can see") and knows that he "shall never rest again."

P. 69, Il. 1065-1076. The last chorus states with a clarity unusual in Aeschylus and more characteristic of Euripides, the exact problem of the Trilogy. First came the sin of Atreus against the children of Thyestes -though that too was an act of revenge; second, the punishment of that by Thyestes' son Aigisthos when he and Clytemnestra murdered Agamemnon; thirdly, the punishment of that second crime at Apollo's bidding by Orestes. Is Orestes the Third Saviour, or is his act only another link in the interminable chain of crime? If the Curse is now brought to sleep, is that because the House is really purified or because there is nothing left for the Curse to work upon? For the "Third Saviour," see my Four Stages of Greek Religion, p. 46 ff. "First comes this year with its pride and its pollution, then the winter that kills it, then the clean spring First comes the crime, then the punishment, which is only another crime, then perhaps the redemption." Whether Orestes is a saviour or a final caster-down of the race is determined in the next play, the Eumenides.

GEORGE ALLEN & UNWIN LTD
LONDON: 40 MUSEUM STREET, W.C.I
CAPE TOWN: 58-60 LONG STREET
TORONTO: 91 WELLINGTON STREET WEST
BOMBAY: 15 GRAHAM ROAD, BALLARD ESTATE
CALCUTTA: 17 CENTRAL AVENUE, P.O. DHARAMTALA,
WELLINGTON, N.Z.: 8 KINGS CRESCENT, LOWER HUTT
SYDNEY, N.S.W.: BRADBURY HOUSE, 55 YORK STREET

FATE CENTRAL SERVEY

The is due for return on or belone the date last marked below.

Date	Date
and the second s

STATE CENTRAL LIBRARY WEST BENGAL

Books are issued for fourteen days only. Books lost, defaced or injured in any way shall have to be replaced by the borrower.

P. S. (1)--47,000